ABSTRACT

The rules of criminal law can be considered legal rules that have the necessary characteristics, and these rules are intended to achieve the most important vital goals related to the social and political entity, especially since criminal law is a branch of other public law branches, and it is possible to employ general criminal law in order to achieve and ensure rights related to the public interest, and thus preserving the entity of the state and not harming it socially at the level of the individual, family and group, as well as politically by respecting the general basic principles of the state constitution and its political institutions.
